

Abstract

This paper hopes to enlighten the reader in several areas of safety and compliance of Chinese manufactured products, particularly those that have an effect on human life or wellbeing if compromised. Thus the paper will focus primarily on food, drugs and other consumer related products on the grounds that noncompliance instinctively stirs the emotions and consequently politics into the problem often doing little to support the critical cause and effect analysis needed to ensure long term compliance and safety. China is put front and center in the discussion due to its emergence in the global food, drug and safe product trading. Whether products are becoming less safe or the massive growth in exports is to blame for the increased number of incidents being reported will be debated in many venues. In fact, occurrences, actions and reactions are taking place so rapidly, it is anticipated that this discussion will need ongoing revisits and updating.
